

Robin Welch Stearns started her career at the Central Intelligence Agency where she spent five years in the Directorate of Operations. She worked undercover to support intelligence gathering all over the world. While at the Agency she developed an expertise in insider risk and sensitive program management. In 2011 she was recruited to help start the Global Investigations program at Google.

After spending 7 years leading Google's investigations program globally, Robin built Google's world class global workplace violence prevention program. During her 12 years at Google she shaped global programs on insider risk, workplace violence, threat detection and management, intelligence, investigations and physical security. Benchmarked throughout the industry, these programs remain best-in-class examples of sophisticated, high impact corporate security.

In 2023 Robin left Google to start Pacific Resilience Group (PRG), a firm specializing in delivering end-to-end security programs for the private sector. PRG leverages decades of hands-on experience inside Fortune 500 companies to give companies modern security solutions suited to the speed and demands of business. PRG helps large companies accelerate or enhance their existing security capabilities, and partners with startups to design and deliver right-sized security programs catered to rapid growth.
